Critical thinking- What do you think of this lecture? What is she exactly trying to say? What's wrong with the globalisation of English? One language means better communication and understanding? She suggests that translation should be done but surely some phrases, words don't translate the same, possibly meaning a misunderstanding of idea or concept? What solutions does she offer for the poor, no testing systems, keeping native languages? Anything else?

Don't insist on English ANSWERS*

TED TALK: Patricia Ryan [Dec 2010. 10:35]

1. What is the topic of her talk?

Language loss and globalisation of English

2. What is important about the reference to learning names of plants in Arabic from grandparents and great grandparents?

It is to show the effect of communication across generations

3. What 'sad' fact does she say about languages?

That they are dying at an unprecedented rate. A language dies every 14 days - is there a connection with the globalisation of English??

4. Why was the recruitment of English teachers 25 years ago mutually beneficial to Kuwait and the UK?

For Kuwait it helped modernisation and to empower the citizens through education and for the UK it was oil.

5. What has happened to English in the last 25 years? What is significant about the example of the mono-lingual Dutch speaker?

It has morphed into a massive international business. the Dutch speaker example is that a person shouldn't be rejected from entering university just because their level of English isn't high enough. More important points should be considered especially if the degree is not based solely on English. i.e. computer coding.

7. What are the reservations she points out about English as a global language?

Against using it as a barrier. English can become quite arbitrary. Only one or two main languages could be disastrous. E.g. Access to study.

8. What's the main negative point mentioned about tests?

The poor can't access them so they are being excluded. Also, that some of the great people like Einstein didn't need English tests.

9. What is said about employment?

'Education is the great divide'. The best jobs go to people out of Western Universities.

10. Why was the Kenyan boy given a Heroes award?

Because he invented a cost-free solar lamp so the children in his village could study at night.
